LASH La RUE WESTERN

THE UNKNOWN TRAIL

Brad Burch drew rein before the Bar None Saloon in Keanville, Arizona. Tying up his horse, he stood for a moment regarding the Sheriff's office across the street and down a piece. His eyes narrowed. Sheriff Bob Terrin had cast more than one suspicious glance at him lately. And Brad knew that the Sheriff was never one to waste his time.

Had he guessed that Burch was really the Masked Terror who had despoiled the payroll of the Golconda Gold Mines month after month? A faint shrug of the shoulder was Brad Burch's only response to his own question. He'd known of the risks involved when he'd started the highway robberies. It had been the threat of financial ruin through cattle herds depleted by disease that had forced him into crime. He'd been ripe for Kedge Haydon's scheme when the mine agent had approached him with the plan for robbing the payrolls. Burch remembered the conversation that had taken place on the veranda of his ranch-house some weeks previously. He remembered Kedge Haydon's eyes on him, sharp, penetrating.

"I'm givin' you a chance of getting back on your feet," Kedge had said. "In a couple of weeks you'll be a bankrupt. It won't be easy, Brad, to go from bein' a ranch-owner to a rannyan in somebody else's bunkhouse gang at a couple of lousy bucks a week."

"You'll supply me all information?" Brad Burch asked.

"I'll give you times, places and amounts," Kedge Haydon said. "All you have to do is hold up the payroll wagon. We can stagger the raids, keep 'em off-balance so that they'll never know when you'll hit 'em. Four robberies is enough. After that we can split!"

Now the fourth and last robbery was over and done with. At his ranch-house, Burch had hidden over forty thousand in cash, in small bills impossible to trace. The time for dividing up the loot had come. Except, of course, as Burch chuckled coldly to himself, there wouldn't be any dividing. He had Kedge Haydon right where he wanted him. All he had to do was sit tight and refuse to give up a dollar. Haydon would never dare to confess; by doing so, he'd implicate himself. The forty-thousand would then be Burch's.

Brad Burch turned toward the door of the Bar None and froze in his tracks. Kedge Haydon came out. He didn't pause or show any sign of recognition. Watching his eyes, Burch saw him glance sharply down the main street, then gave a little twitch of his head. Briefly, aware that the Sheriff might be watching, Burch gave a short, almost imperceptible nod. Haydon went on, unhitched his horse and rode out of town toward the Kawjoo Indian Reservation, on whose lands the Golconda mines were located.

Burch went inside the Bar None and waited. He knew the showdown might as well come now, or later. Half-an-hour afterward he left the Bar None and rode out of town in the opposite direction to that Kedge Haydon had taken. It would never do, he knew, to give any indication to the Sheriff's sharp eyes that he and Haydon were in cahoots.

Outside of Keanville, he doubled around, crossed the Forked Ridge and picked his way up Fireplace Creek toward the mine workings on the reservation. They were far beyond the Indian village itself and were surrounded by low, rocky rises that effectively hid them from ground-view. The mine agent's house was several thousand feet off. Here Haydon lived alone, with only a young Indian boy to run errands and cook his food.

Burch waited until dark came. He kept vigil in the shadow of several boulders until he saw the mine workers streaming back on their horses into Keanville. Then, as a single lamp was lighted in Kedge Haydon's small house, he untethered his horse and rode toward it.

Dismounting, he went inside. Kedge Haydon was sitting at a small pine table, finishing his supper. Burch looked at him inquiringly.

"You can talk," Haydon said. "I sent the Injun kid down to the mine on an errand. Better be fast; he's liable to come back any minute. Where's my share of the dough?"

"You ain't gettin' anyl," Burch spat suddenly.

With an oath, Haydon swept the dishes from the table in anger.

"We both plotted those jobsl," he roared, "and I want my sharel"

"There's no way you can get it," Burch said evenly. "You can't confess because you'd go to jail yourself." He paused and smiled thinly. "I'm sorry, Kedge, but I need all that dough. And there's no use gettin' hot under the collar.

LASH LARUE WESTERN

I've got every ace in my hand. You don't hold a card worth lookin' at!"

From beet-red, Kedge Haydon's anger-suffused face went to deep purple. Confused animal noises started in his throat. Abruptly his right hand dave far his gun.

But both Brad Burch's guns were out already. They spat thunder. Kedge Haydon staggered, his face a mask of agony. Then as he crashed dead to the floor, Burch heard a sound behind him. He whirled. The Indian boy was standing there, wide-eyed.

At gunpoint he forced the boy to help him tie Haydon's body across the saddle-bow of the mine-agent's horse, then mount behind on the saddle itself. With gun trained on the Indian, they rode out into the desert toward the line of high buttes that were strung across the western sky.

They reached the butte after an hour's ride. Burch undid the saddle from Haydon's horse and slapped it toward freedom. He knew it would wander into the wilds northward, away from Keanville. Then he tied the saddle on his own. Time enough to dispose of it when he reached home.

It was nearly dark now. Carrying Haydon's body, the two stumbled along the rising path to the summit. When they reached the top, there was little light left. Burch, dropped Haydon's feet. In the gathering darkness his fingers lightened on his trigger. Then he cursed as the Indian, twisting suddenly, jumped to one side and began running.

Burch fired twice. In the last light he saw the Indian leap as the bullet caught him and scream aloud in agony. Then, not daring to lose an instant, lest the darkness cut off his retreat altogether, he darted back down the steep, narrow path. Not far down he halted, removed a flat rock that had bridged two sides of the path, sent it tumbling down and grinned wickedly.

Two hours later Burch rode into his own ranch-yard. Quickly he stripped Haydon's saddle of any identifying marks; he could simply say it was his. Then he hit the hay.

It was long past noon when his exhausted body began to stir. Hurriedly he arose, anxious to carry out the last part of his plan. It was necessary to send his forty-thousand stolen dollars out of town to the general delivery in a distant town, addressed to himself. He could then ride into the next state, claim the money in the package addressed to himself and safely bank it unsuspected.

Riding down Main Street, he slowed as he approached Sheriff Bob Terrin's office. The post-office was only a few doors further off. A sneer crossed his face as he considered how cleverly he had fooled everybody. Suddenly a shadow fell across his path, and he looked up with a gasp to find himself staring into the guns of Sheriff Bob Terrin.

"Inside!" the Sheriff ordered. "And I'll take that package!"

Bob Terrin marched him up the steps into his office, held one gun on him while he unwrapped the package with the other. For one instant he stared down at the bundle of currency.

"I thought it might have been you, Burch," Terrin said softly. "You were the hardest hit of all our ranchers. But there was no way of proving you were the Masked Terror — until now!"

"Until — until now?," Burch stammered in terror.

"High Eagle!" the Sheriff called.

An Indian boy came in through the open door to the back room, stared impassively at Burch, whose eyes went wide.

"That him," he said. "That the man who killed mine agent. Both of them plotted robberies."

"I — I thought you were dead," Burch muttered.

"Just playin' possum — as Injuns will," Sheriff Terrin said. "You winged him a little, of course. But early this mornin', he climbed off that butte — with a little help, of course. You figured on him dyin', but you forgot there's brush atop most of those buttes. He played another Injun trick — started a fire with two sticks and a little brush early this morning, making Injun smoke signals with his shirt. His own tribe spied 'em, laid another stone across the gap in the path, and he climbed down. Then he came here with his story." The Sheriff stared grimly at Brad Burch. "And as soon as we climb up to the butte top and find the dead body of Kedge Haydon, we'll add another charge to highway robbery — murder!"
